WHAT ARE THE ACTIVATION UNITS (Catalysts)?

The difference in each Spirovital device is in the number of activation units (catalysts) contained within each machine. Each device contains activation units made up of single or double (called Bicats) catalysts. The Basis Plus device has two single catalysts, the L.A. Plus has one double and one single catalyst and the Pro Plus device contains two double catalysts.

The activation units (or catalysts) inside the device are part of the energy generation process. Each activation unit contains a wavelength of red light and a catalyst. When air is pulled into the device via a filter, the oxygen molecules are changed in the activation chambers from their normal triplet state to singlet oxygen. Singlet oxygen lives for less than a nanosecond, goes back to its ground state and as it does so releases energy. The more activation units in the Spirovital device, the more energy is therefore produced. This is especially important for those who are chronically ill and of the older generation. It is not just the time spent on the device which is important; it is the intensity of therapy which is more important. That's why we advise people to have a device with as many activation units as they can afford.
